

A new proclamation for a new Ireland

WRITTEN by 5th and 6th class – Aston Village ETNS

We all know how the world was in 1916. If you think about it, has the world changed now? Much of it has, but a lot has not. A life for freedom is what our ancestors yearned to shape Ireland towards.

We still believe that Ireland should be an independent free country. Irish people should be free to make their own decisions and their own votes, and not have anyone in the way of following our dreams. We want peace in our country.

We should strive to keep life affordable for all. Ireland should have free healthcare and education. A lot of us think that learning Irish should be optional because not a lot of people speak it.

Ireland is a fantastic place for history, geography and science and a lot of us like Ireland the way it is. The children of our country now have not yet endured the pain of Ireland's difficulties. We believe that Ireland is entitled to a fair future and an especially bright one for the future young generations. Ireland should be fun and happy for children, and we must not be looked down upon, but instead greeted with the help of others as equals.

We should treat people equally and fairly that come from different countries. We should respect each other, regardless of race. We should all have equal religious rights. We should not neglect other countries but embrace their cultures as part of our own. We want more people to live in Ireland.
